First Subheading

This page is an example of what the first page after your title page should look like. You should notice a couple specific items. First, in APA format there is no longer a running head, so at the very top of the page should just be a page number with no last name. Second, the repeated title, we copy and pasted the title from our title page on to our second page. This is the only page that will have the repeated title. Notice that it is still centered and bold. Next, our first subheading, most instructors will give you the headings you will be using. They will also be bold and centered. Now, you can start writing under your first heading!

Second Subheading

Next, we move on under our second subheading. The second subheading should be bold and centered just like the first. Take note that there is not a colon after the subheadings. Also, notice that we are still on the second page of our paper. The second subheading is continued right after we are done after the first, we did not start a new page. We will do the same format for all sections following.

Third Subheading

We are continuing into our third subheading. It stays consistent with our format with continuing right after the prior subheading section is completed. Keep in mind that the third and any other subheading you will be using are centered and bold just like the ones prior. There is also no colon after the subheading which will also stay consistent with the format. The format of continuing right along after each section will continue throughout the paper.
